Abstract

The International Convention Against Doping in Sport, adopted under the auspices of UNESCO, establishes a comprehensive international legal framework aimed at preventing and eliminating doping in sport. Grounded in the principles of human rights, ethics, health protection, and fair play, the Convention promotes harmonisation of anti-doping policies and practices in line with the World Anti-Doping Code. It defines key concepts related to doping control, outlines the responsibilities of States Parties, and emphasises national and international cooperation with organisations such as the World Anti-Doping Agency (WADA). The Convention also highlights the importance of education, training, scientific research, and capacity-building as essential tools in combating doping. By fostering transparency, integrity, and shared responsibility among governments, sports organisations, and athletes, the Convention seeks to safeguard the health of participants, preserve the ethical values of sport, and ensure the credibility and future of sport at all levels.
